- Is there not, however, an increase of adult baptisms in some countries?

Several thousand adult baptisms cannot compensate for the loss of hundreds of thousands of infant baptisms (all the more since the perseverance of the late baptized often leaves something to be desired). Infant baptisms in America averaged over 1.3 million in the 1960's, yet has only recently come back over 1 million baptisms a year, notably on account of the increase in the general population. Almost 150,000 adults converted to the Faith in America in 1960; in 2002, this number was under 80,000.

- Is the case of France or America really typical?

Everywhere interest in the Church is declining. Now only a minority of Catholics fulfill their Sunday obligations, and thousands leave the Church every year. It is especially disquieting that it is above all young people who turn their backs on the Church. Of the 93,000 who left the Church in Germany in 1989, 70 percent were under 35 years old. Between 1970 and 1993, 1.9 million Germans officially left the Catholic Church. Hatred or anger are not the most frequent causes, but simply indifference. The Church no longer speaks to people, she no longer has importance in their lives and thus people go their own way, sometimes simply to avoid the German church tax. Catholicism is on course to become the religion of a small minority. Germany is in danger, as Karl Rahner put it, of becoming a "pagan land with a Christian past and some vestiges of Christianity." The same holds true for most formerly Christian countries.

- Can it not be said that this terrible crisis is merely local, affecting Western Europe and North America, but sparing Latin America, Africa, and Asia, where, on the contrary, Catholicism seems especially dynamic?

Some statistics may suggest that the crisis is merely local. The Pontifical Annuario, for example, stresses that the increase in seminarians and ordinations in the Third World compensates for the decline observed in Western countries. In fact, the crisis is universal, even if it does not appear everywhere in the same way. (Poor countries, where the priesthood can represent social advancement, recruit new vocations relatively easily but of what quality? Latin America, for example, passes for a bastion of Catholicism, but it is in fact becoming Protestant at a more rapid pace than Germany did in the sixteenth century. In 1900, just 3 percent of the population of Brazil were Protestants; they are now 18 percent, and the number continues to increase. Five new Pentecostal churches are built in Rio de Janeiro every week.
