• Has there been a comparable disaster in the congregations of nuns?

Some comments by Cardinal Ratzinger illustrate what has happened by a single example. In the early 1960's, Quebec was the region that counted, proportionally speaking, the most nuns in the world. "Between 1961 and 1981, because of departures, deaths, and the end of new vocations, the number of nuns fell from 46,933 to 26,294, a decline of 44 percent, and there is still no end in sight. During the same period new vocations fell by at least 98.5 percent. A large part of the remaining 1.5 percent is composed, not of young women, but of late vocations. As a result, sociologists agree on a grim but objective conclusion: "Soon (unless there is a reversal of the trend, which is wholly improbable, at least viewed humanly) women's religious life as we have known it will be only a memory in Canada."<sup>3</sup>

• Is not the situation improving today, and can we not now consider that the crisis has past?

In America in 1960, there were 1,527 men ordained to the priesthood. In 1998, only 460 were ordained—a decline of over 1,000 per year. In France in the 1950's there were about 1,000 priestly ordinations per year. In the 1990's there were no more than 100 per year; the number of entries into seminaries continues to decrease. In Germany, 1996 represented a new record low of candidates for the priesthood: German seminaries and religious orders had only 232 entries; as recently as 1986 there were 727 entries.<sup>4</sup> The number of religious in the world continues to decline.<sup>5</sup>

• Does this crisis also affect the faithful?

In the 1950's, Mass attendance in America was often higher than 70 percent among Catholics; some studies show that in 2000, this number had fallen to under 30 percent. In 1958, 35 percent of the French attended Mass every Sunday; today fewer than 5 percent do so, and these are often old people. In 1950 more than 90 percent of the French were baptized as children; today fewer than 60 percent are.
