Even among regularly practicing Catholics the statistics are catastrophic: only 23 percent of them firmly believe in hell, while 54 percent deny its existence. Thirty-four percent of these same practicing Catholics are firmly convinced that Mohammed was a prophet, while only 28 percent deny it (35 percent believe it “up to a point,” the others are not sure).<sup>9</sup> In 2006, only 7 percent of French Catholics believed that Catholicism is the only true religion.<sup>10</sup> “We can measure the depth of the change by noting that in 1952 most Catholics believed that there was but one true religion,” observed the sociologist Yves Lambert.<sup>11</sup> In Valais, the conservative canton of Switzerland that is home to the International Society of Saint Pius X (SSPX) seminary at Ecône, 81.3 percent of Catholics maintain that all religions lead to eternal salvation.<sup>12</sup>

• What lesson can we draw from these statistics?

They show the true extent of the crisis. It is first and foremost a crisis of faith. Not only is the number of those who consider themselves to belong to the Church diminishing, but even the majority of those who are officially members of the Church no longer hold the Catholic faith! Someone who denies a truth of the Faith has lost the Faith, for the Faith must be held as a whole. If 72 percent of Catholics reject belief in hell, not even one Catholic in three still has the Faith.

3) Is the crisis also a moral one?

A crisis of morality goes hand in hand with the crisis of faith. Whereas St. Paul reminded Christians that they should by their way of life shine in the eyes of a corrupt generation like the stars in the firmament (Phil. 2:15), the way of life of contemporary Christians differs little from that of the children of this world, unbelievers, and others. Their weak faith, emptied of substance, no longer has the strength to influence their life, still less to shape it.

• What is the connection between faith and morality?

Man, weakened by original sin, is always inclined to give his passions free rein and thus to lose mastery over himself. The Christian Faith shows man what God expects of him and how he ought to conduct his life in accordance with the will of God. By the Faith man knows the promises of what he can hope for if he keeps the commandments of God, and also the punishments he will suffer if he turns away from God. The Faith and the sacraments give man the power to overcome his bad inclinations and to give himself entirely to the good and to the love of God.

<sup>11</sup> Report of INSEE, Données sociales: La société française (2002-2003 ed.), study by Yves Lambert (CNRS) on “La religion en France des années soixantes à nos jours” [Religion in France from the 1960's to Our Day]. The author notes that the great rupture goes back to the mid- 1960's, marked by a decline in religious practice and belief. Formal adherence to religious confessions persisted somewhat longer, showing its first notable decline in 1975-76.
