By the Faith man knows the promises of what he can hope for if he keeps the commandments of God, and also the punishments he will suffer if he turns away from God. The Faith and the sacraments give man the power to overcome his bad inclinations and to give himself entirely to the good and to the love of God.

• What are the moral consequences of a crisis of faith?

When he loses faith man no longer believes that he is called to moral perfection and eternal life in God's presence. He will inevitably yield himself more and more to the unregulated pleasures of this life.

• Does the contemporary crisis of morality also affect Catholics?

We are today experiencing this reality. Fidelity, purity, justice, and the spirit of sacrifice are no longer uncontested goods, even for Christians. These days one marriage in three ends in divorce after five to ten years, and ever more Catholics seek Church recognition of separation and "remarriage" after divorce. In 1984 the review Herderkorrespondenz showed that, in the very Catholic region of Austria called the Tyrol, 88 percent of the population rejected the Catholic teaching on birth control, and that among the population aged eighteen to thirty full adhesion to Catholic teaching in this regard was practically non-existent (1.8 percent). In the Valais 81.5 percent of Catholics believe that divorced and "remarried" Catholics should be able to receive Communion.¹³ In France in 2003 one quarter of practicing Catholics stated that, for them, the idea of sin had little importance. The number of annulments in America jumped from 338 in 1968 to over 50,000 in 1998.

4) Is there also a crisis of the clergy today?

The lack of vocations to the priesthood and the religious life together with the large numbers of priests and religious who abandon their duties show the profound crisis that is ravaging the clergy as well. Many of her members have lost the Faith, and the clergy in general is no longer capable of communicating and inflaming people with the Faith.

• What is the connection between the crisis of faith and the crisis of the clergy?

The crisis of the clergy is the cause of the crisis of faith amongst Catholics. If the faith of Catholics who attend Sunday Mass regularly is so weak, the cause must have its origins in defective preaching.
